General Metals CEO Provides Details of Promising Junior Mine in Wall Street Ledger Interview

A Wall Street Ledger audio interview with CEO Forbush provides an overview of General Metal's junior mining operation which is nearing production and located in the heart of the Battle Mountain-Cortez Gold Trend in Lander County

Reno, Nevada, October 11, 2012— General Metals Corporation (OTC.QB: GNMT) announced the availability of a recent audio interview with Dan Forbush, CEO and the Wall Street Ledger. The audio provides an overview its Independence mine and updates potential investors about the latest progress towards production, its competitive advantage, depth of management and the amount of measured, indicated and inferred mineralization of gold and silver.

The Independence Mine's Competitive Advantages

"There are two distinct competitive advantages to the Independence mine," notes Forbush. "The first is how near to production we are and the second is that we are located in 'elephant country'—geographically in the same Battle Mountain-Cortez Trend where some of the largest gold mining companies in the world are producing millions of ounces of gold and silver and pounds of copper."

The previously announced Preliminary Economic Assessment (PEA) is nearing completion which will define the broad economic parameters of the gold and silver mining operation. Concurrent with the development of the PEA, the Company will be advancing environmental and baseline permitting work at the property.

According to Forbush, "We are very focused on the PEA and we expect the report to make clear what precious metals we can recover within a reasonable cost framework."
